When Movements Go Beyond Control: World Movement Disorder Day

Movement disorders are neurological conditions that disrupt the brain's control of voluntary and involuntary movements. They cause abnormal movements like spasms, jerking, rigidity, or slowness are caused because of damage to or malfunction of the areas of the brain that control movement.

Movement disorders account for 3-8% of neurological conditions in India among people over 60 years. Approximately 31 to 45 out of every 100,000 individuals over 60 years are affected by movement disorder. These conditions are more commonly seen in rural areas of India.

Movement disorders can be categorized in several ways, including but not limited to:

- Blepharospasm - frequent or forceful blinking that can make it hard to keep eyes open.
- Hemifacial spasm - twitching or tightening on one side of the face.
- Cervical dystonia - uncontrollable squeezing movements in the face and neck

Prof. Dr. Hrishikesh Kumar
Director & Vice Chairman, Head of Neurology Institute of Neurosciences, Kolkata

"Cervical dystonia makes the neck movements beyond one's control. Even simple moments - turning to greet someone or nodding yes - feel painful and exhausting. Many live through this misery silently, not knowing what is ailing them. Even if they become aware of the condition, they don't know help exists. With early diagnosis and timely treatment, the pain can ease, movements can return, and life can feel lighter again. Every patient deserves that relief - to look up, move freely, and live with comfort once more."

Dr. Vinay Goyal
Chairman Neurology, Movement Disorder Clinic, Medanta The Medicity, Gurugram

"Frequent eye blinking is often mistaken for dry eyes, especially when accompanied by redness. However, in some cases, the real cause may not be dryness, but a condition called blepharospasm. Using lubricating eye drops or gels may not provide relief, as the problem lies in the muscle control rather than eye dryness. There are therapies which offering faster and longer-lasting relief."

Dr. Pettarup Murzban Wadia
Consultant Neurologist and Movement Disorder Specialist, Jaslok Hospital and Research Centre, Mumbai

"Hemifacial spasm is a neurological condition that causes involuntary twitching or contractions on one side of the face, usually starting around the eye and spreading to the lower face. It is most often caused by a blood vessel pressing on the facial nerve (7th cranial nerve) near the brainstem. There are long-term cure available which helps in relieving the pressure on the 7th nerve."

Early consultation with a neurologist with specialization in movement disorder can help patients regain control & restore movement. To know more, visit your nearby Neurologist.
